

Introduction

Intelligent Information Network

The Intelligent Information Network (IIN) offers companies an understanding of how the role of the network is evolving to meet business needs. The IIN vision is essentially the concept of network simplification through the alignment of technology and business priorities. Beyond evolution, the role of the network is expanding as more and more services become available network offerings. Cisco has established four technological roadmaps specific to the individual business needs of its customers. Each of the four roadmaps defines the IIN vision for a particular market segment or business type. These architectures are meant to show businesses how to look forward three to five years in planning network expansion. These four technological roadmaps are as follows:

- Service-Oriented Network Architecture (SONA)
- Service Provider Architecture (IP Next-Generation-Networks or IP-NGN)
- Commercial Architecture
- Consumer Architecture

Together these comprise the foundation of the IIN. The goal of the IIN is to build intelligence across multiple protocols and infrastructure layers to allow the network to be more aware of the needs of its users and respond efficiently to those needs by allocating needed resources and/or applications regardless of the nature of the connected device. The network aligns itself with the business priorities of an organization through services, availability, adaptivity, and resilience. The Cisco vision of the IIN composition includes these features:

- Network resource and information asset integration into the network—Includes video, voice, and data integration into the network infrastructure
- Cross-platform/cross-product intelligence spanning all layers of infrastructure—

Network-wide extension of that intelligence to permit end-to-end connectivity and a common user experience regardless of access device or method

- A network that actively participates in the delivery of services and applications—

Proactive allocation of network resources as needs demand for a particular application, service, or user

IIN is beyond the traditional concept of basic network connectivity, bandwidth allocation, and access to applications. A true IIN offers end-to-end functionality that adaptively shapes the user experience on-the-fly and promotes true business transparency and agility.

The evolutionary approach of the IIN technology model consists of the following three essential phases. In each phase, the opportunity exists to further augment the applications and services available to meet the business need.

- Integrated transport phase—The network is a common pathway for all traffic types. Each traffic type is classified according to the identified business priorities and/or the nature and
