

The revolution of the printing press

Invented by Johannes Gutenberg around 1450, the printing press of movable types allowed the edition of books in series for the first time. This revolution in the transmission of ideas and knowledge was decisive for the quick diffusion of the Renaissance thinking.

Advanced Printing was introduced in the Middle Ages in the 15th century. It was the first time that printing was used with movable types, which allowed the production of printed pages with the press in 1450.

Gutenberg's contributions

The process of printing from early movable type was laborious and slow. Gutenberg's invention of the printing press and the use of movable type allowed for the mass production of printed text.

The introduction of the printing press allowed for the mass production of printed text.

From the world to the press

To print a text with these letters, one used a tray with the type, another tray with the paper and a third with the ink. The ink was spread on the tray with the press and printed on the paper. The ink was spread on the tray with the press and printed on the paper.

Type tray The tray where the type is placed to be printed. It is made of wood and has a lid to keep the type from falling out.

Hand crank The hand crank is used to operate the press. It is made of wood and has a handle that is turned by the operator.

The production of movable metallic types

Gutenberg made metallic types with lead alloy from two lead particles. They provided an ideal substrate for the composition of the letters. The production was a slow process.

Print and the original The original was the letter that was used to create the type. The printing press was used to produce the type.
