

2 Basic Types of PP

PP, a semi-crystalline thermoplastic, is made in its homopolymer form by polymerising propylene monomer using stereospecific Ziegler-Natta catalysts. The catalyst system is termed stereospecific because it controls the position of the side (methyl) group in each propylene unit in the polymeric chain. A typical catalyst system may be prepared by combining titanium trichloride with tributyl aluminium or its variants. Most commercial PP is isotactic.

The physical properties and processing characteristics of PP are mainly determined by the molecular weight (average number of propylene units in a chain), the molecular weight distribution (variation in average length of chains) and the type and amount of copolymerising monomer. The selection of the right grade of PP for a specific application involves

- choosing between homopolymer and copolymer,
- choosing a reactor or controlled rheology grade,
- defining the melt flow rate required and the appropriate additive system.

However, with changes in manufacturing technology, operating conditions and catalyst systems, the traditional differences between the properties of homopolymers and copolymers have blurred [4-6]. Hence, an open mind is necessary to select a proper grade for a particular application.

2.1 Homopolymer

Homopolymer PP is made by polymerising propylene in the presence of a stereospecific catalyst. Homopolymers are more rigid and have better resistance to high temperatures than copolymers but their impact strength at temperatures below zero is limited (Section 4.3.2).

Typical applications for homopolymer polypropylene include windshield washer tanks, shrouds for fans and steering columns, housings for domestic appliances such as hair dryers, sterilisers, irons, coffee makers, toasters, etc., extrusion of fibres and filaments for carpet backing, upholstery fabrics, clothing, geotextiles, disposable diapers, medical fabric and automotive interior fabrics.

2.2 Copolymer

The properties of PP depend on the type and amount of comonomer. There are two basic types: random copolymer and heterophasic or block copolymer. The random polymers contain 1.5% to 6% by weight of ethylene or higher alkenes (such as butene-1) in random distribution and in a single chemical phase. The essential difference between a random and a block copolymer is that the block copolymer contains
