

Spring: The Double-Joy Season

I LOVE SPRING ANYWHERE, BUT IF I COULD CHOOSE I WOULD ALWAYS GREET IT IN A GARDEN.
— RUTH STOUT

Spring brings double joy to my garden: first, harvesting the new bounty of spring treasures, and second, digging in the dirt to start planting for the flavors of summer. After the somewhat sparse harvest baskets of winter, suddenly I'm faced with an overflow of lush, gorgeous produce: fava beans, sugar snap and sweet peas, breakfast radishes, brassicas, new potatoes, loads of lettuces, loquats, alpine strawberries, rhubarb, and citrus of all sorts fill our veggie beds and baskets. Everything, and I mean everything, is blossoming—from the roses first off the hook bloom to the pineapple guava trees—the thought of which makes me sneeze and smile all at the same time. In spring, preparing delicious meals just becomes a matter of how to best show off these natural goodies, and there are so many simple ways to incorporate all of the sweetness of this season.

It wasn't until I started raising chickens that I realized there is definitely a season for eggs, too. It's no wonder eggs are a center-stage star for Easter, because there certainly is a ramp-up in egg production in the springtime.

Spring is when the mid-winter entertaining lull lifts and impromptu outdoor cocktail hours and garden dinner parties kick into gear again. I often anchor my outdoor table with pretty potted plants. It's an easy way to make sure things look inviting, and there's no need to fuss with cut flowers for the table. If the flowers in the garden are in bloom, it's easy to create a few small bouquets to tuck in among the green.

This is the season that always fills me with Zyrtec and the thrill of possibility, inspired by the new and longer light, and the blooms, buds, and bounty of the garden. The recipes in this section include many of my absolute favorites. From garden to kitchen and back outside again, where a fresh, simple dinner surrounded by the scent of fresh soil mingles with the sweetness of those first roses, spring seduces again and again.
