

Thousands serving vital roles nationwide One year in, AmeriCorps boosts US public health workforce

BEFORE THE PANDEMIC, Farid Howard, 32, had never considered a career in public health. When COVID-19 hit, he had been working as a luthier, building and repairing guitars. But the guitar factory shut down when the pandemic hit, leaving him without a job.

One day, while reading the Los Angeles County Department of Public Health's Twitter feed, an update caught his eye. It talked about a new partnership between the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention and AmeriCorps to combat COVID-19 health disparities in Los Angeles. "I had never heard of

AmeriCorps before that, and I had no experience in public health," he told The Nation's Health. "But AmeriCorps required no previous public health experience, so I saw it as a great opportunity to explore the public health

Young workers increasingly endangered State legislators rolling back child labor protections

ON FEB. 13, lawmakers in Arkansas filed a bill to roll back laws on employing 14- and 15-year-olds. Less than a week later, a federal investigation made national headlines: Packers Sanitation Services was illegally employing children as young as 13 to clean up at meat-processing plants in eight states.

Two of the plants were in Arkansas. Laura Kellams, a child welfare advocate in the state, assumed the alarming news would spark movement on the child labor bill introduced just days earlier.

"I thought, surely this bill won't run now," Kellams, who serves as Northwest Arkansas director at Arkansas Advocates for Children and Families, told The Nation's Health. "But the next week, it passed the House."

Opponents like Kellams dug in, trying to stop the bill in the Arkansas Senate, arguing against removing requirements that kids younger than 16 get parental permission and obtain a permit that verifies their age. But the bill sailed through, and Gov. Sarah Huckabee Sanders signed it into law in March. Now, a critical paper trail that helped protect vulnerable children and catch employers that break the law has been lost, Kellams said. "We tried reminding [legislators] that this isn't a 100-year-old problem," Kellams said about the exploitation of child workers. "This is a crisis that's

Mortality rates rise States embrace move to cover Medicaid users for year after childbirth

IN RARE agreement on a public health issue that has reached crisis levels, nearly two-thirds of U.S. states have extended Medicaid coverage for a full year postpartum.

That means hundreds of thousands of low-income women will have medical coverage during the critical months that follow childbirth, helping to protect their health and the health of their babies.

As of late June, 36 states had implemented the 12-month extension and nine others had plans in the works, according to KFF. Texas, Utah and Wisconsin had proposed limited expansion. Only three states — Arkansas, Idaho and Iowa — were complete holdouts.

"It's great to see states electing the postpartum coverage extension option, and it really opens the door to a conversation about what we need to be doing for women and children in these time-sensitive periods," Maggie Clark, MJ, program director at
