

Child Psychiatric Examination

4.10.1 Psychological Examination of the Infant, Child, and Adolescent

Infants, children, teens, and adolescents are assessed in a manner that is sensitive to their age, level, and developmental stage.

Close attention to the clinical diagnostic assessment of the child and adolescents of the process they reflect, understanding the nature and extent of the child's assessment as behavioral difficulties, and identification of factors in the child, family, and environment that cause, exacerbate, or potentially ameliorate these difficulties. Although behavioral gathering and differential diagnosis are the primary aims of such assessments, the evaluation process should also facilitate the development of an alliance with the children around understanding the child's difficulties and providing the treatment services that may be necessary for the evaluation.

Psychiatric assessment of the child or adolescent is undertaken for a variety of purposes, including individualized care or other evaluation for treatment that may be required; emergency department assessment of safety issues that need for hospitalization; consultation with pediatric, school, or legal services; as a component of family or other social treatment; and for research purposes. Although the clinical use and style of the assessment vary in some extent depending on the purpose and setting, certain elements are common to all of the assessments.

Historical information about interventions, family, child, and clinical assessment may differ, for example, as a consequence of child and adolescent psychology. Clinical evaluation of the child or adolescent is challenging, with examples in that the clinician needs to be well-versed across a range of techniques for eliciting information on various aspects of the child's functioning. This information must then be synthesized from multiple theoretical perspectives using the clinician's knowledge of developmental and psychopathology to arrive at a diagnostic formulation that best guides treatment planning efforts.

The initial portion of this synthesis involves the comprehensive clinical assessment of the child and adolescent, including developmental history
