Book Review: Home From the War. By Robert Jay Lifton. Simon & Schuster. $8.95.

Some months ago we spotted Robert Jay Lifton's Home from the War as a logical choice for special attention. But Don Browning, to whom we commended it for review, saw in it more than an intelligent examination of Vietnam, veterans' subsequent experiences. He has used it as a trigger for discussion of potential trends in pastoral care and religious counseling. For that reason, we scheduled his argument for this special issue on theological education and pastoral training. Browning's comment is significant because he shows that pastoral care people are trying to forget what psychiatrists like Lifton are trying to remember. He plunges the readers into the specialist-technical vs. wholistic-organic models. The consequences of the debate will be felt by all who are subjects of or practitioners of pastoral counseling.

The American people have been told by their leaders that the war in Vietnam is over -- though in fact it is not. Our own men have been removed from battle, but the shooting, bombing, maiming and killing continue. Robert Lifton's new book, Home from the War, tells us with startling vividness something else that we know but, sometimes manage to push from consciousness: that the war is not over even for Americans. Echoes of it rumble on in our minds and emotions. And especially is this true for the returning veteran.

Lifton writes about the Vietnam veterans -- their guilt, their anger, their confusion, their struggles for wholeness. In this account of his experience as a counselor to a rap group of veterans affiliated with Vietnam Veterans Against the War, Lifton has given us a remarkably penetrating and sensitive psychohistorical study of these young men's inner experience of the tenor and purposelessness of that war.

The book is painful to read: the war is behind us and we do not want to be confronted further by its horrible reality. Some readers will call the book highly biased; the author sees only one side of the Vietnam conflict -- its brutality and moral bankruptcy. Others will find the account unscientific; it deals with the experiences of only a few men.

But in my opinion Home from the War is of considerable importance. First, it provides Americans with, a primary document that portrays the inner psychological and moral landscape of this most "modern" of modern wars. Lifton has dedicated his career in psychiatric research to investigating a variety of uniquely modern confrontations with death and man's perennial struggle to overcome it. In Life in Death, Revolutionary Immortality, and Thought Reform and the Psychology of Totalism, he has probed the theme of death in relation to the survivors of Hiroshima, Marxist revolutionary action, and Communist China's practices of political reeducation.
