

RONNA BLOOM

For a brief moment that bird with tiny black eyes saw me and I became part of its experience as it became part of mine. We held hands. Or, we held hand and foot. I have no idea how perception is experienced by a bird, whether I'm like a fun house mirror with eyes like tears. But we registered on each other's Richter scale of the day and unless they are keeping track in their nests as I am in mine, nothing remains but vibration.

On my way out of the park, I heard a young man calling, "Look a red-tailed hawk up there!" He had the tone that said, I have to tell somebody! I looked up but I was right under it and with the sun in my eyes I couldn't see it. I stepped back a few feet and then a few more feet walking backwards up the slope until its hawkish profile appeared in the tree against the sky, and then it shat, just missing me.

What a mighty thing! The bird was calm and unperturbed, the way cows shit while walking it shat while sitting. It observed the world. It switched and twitched but stayed put. Not apparently hungry or thirsty or tired or needing flight, it sat in the primal sit. Hawk being hawk.

Then I turned and climbed back up the hill and headed to the shopping street where I went into the Polish deli and bought pickle soup, salad, bread and kielbasa. There were red sweetheart roses in a bucket and yellow tulips. Outside two monks walked past in red robes.
