Abstract

Decisions about back pain treatment are often made in the presence of both physician and patient uncertainty. Therefore, we developed a computerized, interactive video program to help patients make informed decisions about undergoing low back surgery. Program development was guided by the shared decision-making model, a comprehensive literature synthesis, information from administrative databases, and focus groups of patients and physicians. Core segments are tailored to each patient's age and diagnosis; and include a narrative, excerpts from patient interviews, animated graphics illustrating spinal anatomy, and tabular summaries of the benefits and risks of both surgical and non-surgical treatment. As part of a multifocal information dissemination effort, interactive videodiscs were placed in five medical facilities in two Washington State counties. Patients ($N = 239$) who viewed the video program completed short evaluation forms. The majority rated the video's understandability (84%) and interest (64%) as very good or excellent. Most patients felt the amount of information provided was appropriate (75%) and over half (56%) believed the discussion of surgical versus non-surgical treatment was completely balanced. Fewer patients (17%) remained undecided about therapy after watching the program than before (29%). We conclude that interactive videodisc technology offers substantial promise as a means of involving patients in their own medical decision making.

Introduction

Surgery for low back problems is usually elective and there are many non-surgical therapeutic options. Furthermore, it has been demonstrated that recovery from pain and mild neurologic deficits often occurs gradually without surgical intervention, so that long-term outcomes can be similar for operative and non-operative low back pain treatments (Weber, 1983). Uncontrolled studies have also shown excellent outcomes of vigorous rehabilitation for patients with herniated discs, even after surgery has been advised (Swezey et al., 1986; Saal and Saal, 1989). Thus, choices necessarily depend heavily on an individual patient's subjective evaluation of pain severity, the probable speed of resolution, surgical risks, and the need for several weeks of recovery and rehabilitation following surgery (Deyo et al., 1992).

Accordingly, we have developed a patient education program that uses interactive media (both computer and videodisc) to help patients make more informed decisions about undergoing back surgery. Entitled the 'Shared Decision-Making Program: Treatment Choices for Low Back Pain', the program is intended primarily for patients with
