

Studies in youth, drug and alcohol consumption at the Centre for Alcohol and Drug Research

Torsten Kolind, Jakob Demant, & Geoffrey Hunt

Centre for Alcohol and Drug Research, Business and Social Sciences, Aarhus University, Denmark

Background: During the 90s and especially in the beginning of the 00s research in youth, drug and alcohol consumption increased markedly in Denmark. Much of this research was applied and placed in a dilemma between reproducing existing social problem characterizations of youthful behaviors or providing genuine contribution to the sociological analysis and understanding of youth cultures. From the mid-00s and forward however, a range of analytical tools were developed at Centre for Alcohol and Drug Research (CRF) in order to understand the relationship between youth, drug and alcohol use and to move beyond the applied perspective into a more social science analytical approach.

Aim: The article investigates the relationship developments between drug and alcohol research and youth research in Denmark in general, with a special focus on research conducted at CRF. Specifically, we will focus on how analytical concepts like, e.g., cultural capital, identity, risk, recreational use, problematic use, and social integration have been developed in a Danish context, and how these concepts are informed by existing international research.

Conclusion: Besides recounting the story of Danish research on youth, drug and alcohol from the perspective of CRF, this paper will conclude by providing a series of tentative conclusions on how research on youth cultures and drug and alcohol consumption can develop in the future.

YOUTH RESEARCH IN DENMARK – A BRIEF OVERVIEW

Youth research in Denmark, unlike comparable work in the UK, has not developed a distinct school of research (Gudmundsson, 2000). In fact, research on youth issues in Denmark, as in other Nordic countries, was initially influenced by intellectual developments in other countries. Initially, these influences came from the US through the work of Coleman (1961) and Erikson (1968/1971), followed in the late 1970s and early 1980s with the work of Thomas Ziehe (1975) and Ziehe and Stabenrauch (1982) in Germany and by the research developments emanating from the Centre for Contemporary Cultural Studies (CCCS) in the UK. This openness to intellectual developments from other countries, unlike the ‘cultural insularity’ of larger nations has meant that Denmark and other Nordic countries ‘have been receptive to cultural and scholarly impulses from many different areas, and youth research has become an arena where this heritage has been cherished and developed’ (Gudmundsson, 2006, p. 86). However, this absence of a distinct youth studies school has also meant that research on youth issues in Denmark has been somewhat fragmented and has developed in a number of different perspectives, including those of education, the media, cultural studies, and sociology (Bay et al., 1985). Consequently, youth research was scattered around at a number of different university departments and independent research centers.

Given the youth cultural revolts and upheavals in the late 1960s and 1970s that occurred in the Nordic countries, as in other European countries, and its effects on Danish Universities and especially sociology departments (see Kropp & Blok, 2011), it is probably not surprising that much of the research on youth was inspired by the CCCS in Birmingham. An interest in youth subcultures and their use of symbolic practices
