Introduction

Few concepts have captured the imagination of critical theorists in recent years quite like biopolitics and its corollary, biopower. In a nutshell, biopower can be defined as a mode of power that takes life as its object, while biopolitics refers to techniques and rationalities of power mobilized in pursuit of the security, growth, and development of individual and collective life (Foucault 1990[1978], 2003). Its current popularity is indebted to French historian Michel Foucault, who developed his understanding of biopolitics to study power relations in a way that did not privilege the state or sovereign models of power. Biopolitics acts in the interest of individual and collective life through producing knowledge of the processes that sustain or retard the optimization of various life processes. It therefore operates through, and directs analytical attention towards, shifting regimes of power/knowledge as well as governmental technologies and interventions that operate beyond the state (Dillon 2007; Duffield 2007).

Foucault's work on biopolitics sparked an ongoing revolution in thought that creates a new political imaginary for analyzing contemporary practices of power and politics. Critical scholars have deployed this concept to theorize the networked and decentralized practices of rule that structure global liberal order but exceed traditional concepts of power and politics centered on the state (e.g., Agamben 1998; Hardt and Negri 2000). The ability of biopolitics to envision seemingly technical, apolitical, and mundane activities as power-laden makes it particularly attractive to research on critical environmental politics. To take one example, Erik Swyngedouw (2009) provocatively argues that widespread calls to save humanity from impending climate catastrophe depoliticize climate change adaptation and curtail critical lines of questioning into what form of life 'we' are protecting, and what form of life 'we' should protect. In this light, Andrew Baldwin suggests that the concept of biopolitics allows us to 'sharpen our understanding
