Abstract In philosophical hermeneutics, the thoughts of Gadamer and Ricoeur about conditions of attaining to understanding are of utmost interest. Gadamer, by proposing "fusion of horizons" and considering the prejudices of interpreter as basic factors of interpreting and understanding of all phenomena, and Ricoeur, by believing that we as human being only can understand the Self through understanding Other, have paved the paths to attaining intercultural understanding. This study tried to investigate the fundamental role of translation in the intercultural understanding from the window of philosophical hermeneutics, because according to Gadamer all understandings occur in language and this asserts that translation, as a linguistic and cultural phenomenon, can, after catastrophe of Babel, take the hearts and tongues of scattered human beings close to each other and as Ricoeur believes, humanity enjoys equivalence in spite of alterity.

Keywords: translation, philosophical hermeneutics, intercultural understanding, intercultural empathy, culture, civilization, Other, Self.

1. Introduction

Ironically, some myths, however unbelievable, have consequences which are credible and real. After the catastrophe of Babel by which the people were scattered in both languages and cultures, the nostalgic need for returning to the time when all humanity had a single language caused people to think of paths for unity. Travels began to discover lost parts of this single humanity and entered it to globalization and made it identical to search for unity.

According to Smith (2000), entering the global era means both discovering physical lands and connecting them in colonial time, and establishing a global market based on western values in post-colonial era.( as cited in Yangsheng, 2009, p. 240). Although these factors may be essential for making connections among different cultures and civilizations, they are not sufficient for making a united cultural humanity, as the experiences of the two World Wars, rising and escalating terrorism, growth in diseases in world level such as aids and the sinister global warming put assertion on it. In this world of dynamic equivalence, as well as differences, agreement among cultures seems troublesome but inevitable.

To reach this agreement, we need interpreting and then understanding other cultures because without understanding a phenomenon communicating with it is impossible and in case of cultures and civilizations may lead to clashes. Hence, humanity needs paths through which it could be able to attain this understanding and indeed agreement. This agreement and understanding after all needs language, the phenomenon in which people seek for unity. But how language can help people? The answer can be a mediator among languages.

The significance of translation in interconnecting people is so obvious that some scholars as Jumptet name the 20th century as "age of translation" or Benjamin names it the "reproduction" (Newmark, 1981, p. 3) and it seems that experiencing calamities in this dynamic world causes humanity to come closer to each other by translation. It seems that humanity needs something more than mere connections to return to the
