

Mass Communications Law

COURTS

- Two types of courts: Trial courts are fact-finding; appellate courts are law-reviewing
- Dual system of courts: The United States has state-level and federal-level courts
- State courts: Vary by state constitution but generally consist of small claims or municipal courts, district courts, appellate courts, and a state supreme court
- Federal courts: Composed of 94 district-level courts, 13 circuit courts, and the Supreme Court
- Judges: At the federal level, judges are appointed by the president and confirmed by the Senate; they are appointed for life but can be impeached
- U.S. Supreme Court
 - Composed of nine justices
 - A case can get to the U.S. Supreme Court by direct appeal, certification, or applying for a writ of certiorari (the most common means), which is an application asking the Supreme Court to order a lower court to send its file on a case to the Supreme Court
 - The Supreme Court looks for "reverses" when determining which cases to hear in a given term; reverses typically refers to appellate courts reaching contradictory decisions on similar cases

LAW

- There is a distinction between civil law and criminal law; the burden of proof is different for each
 - For civil cases, the burden is the preponderance of the evidence
 - For criminal cases, the burden is beyond a reasonable doubt

Where Laws Come From

- God: Acknowledged in the Declaration of Independence as a source of law ("[we] are endowed by [our] Creator with certain unalienable rights")
 - Common law: Consists of case decisions by judges and can provide principles to guide future cases (called "precedent"); it can lead to the creation of new laws
 - Law of equity: Like common law, also judge-made; however, equity law comes from judicial doctrine, such as restraining orders, warrants, or injunctions
 - Statutory law: Derived from legislative action (at the federal, state, or local levels); these laws address larger issues and are collected in codes
- Constitutional law: Derived from the Constitution (at the federal or state levels); addresses what government can and cannot do; there are two major philosophies that guide the interpretation of the Constitution:
 - Judicial activism asks, "What does the Constitution mean today?" and believes that our country has changed since the Constitution was ratified; thus the Constitution needs to be interpreted in the light of modern-day considerations
 - Constructionism asks, "What was the original intent of the framers when the Constitution was ratified?" and believes that original intent should be the foundation in terms of how the Constitution is interpreted today
- Administrative law: Crafted by administrative agencies created by enabling legislation and changed with day-to-day oversight of a specific area of government responsibility; their regulations have the force of law

FIRST AMENDMENT

Background

- Invention of the printing press: Rising authorities were faced with the issue of how to address potentially seditious (i.e., critical of the government) material that could be distributed to the masses
- "The right of kings": Ruling authorities could engage in prior restraint (stopping something before it is published), censorship (restricting or editing material to be printed), and licensing (a means to regulate what gets printed)
 - John Milton's Areopagitica: Presented the first reasoned defense of free speech and free press; argued that rulers should have limited abilities to engage in prior restraint and that certain types of speech (i.e., treasonous, blasphemous, or slanderous) should not be protected
 - John Locke: Prominent philosopher of the late 1600s; believed in a social contract that said it was the role of government to serve the people, not the other way around; argued people were endowed with natural rights and one of the most important was freedom of expression, which government had a responsibility to protect
- Zenger case (1735): Took place in colonial America; John Peter Zenger was clearly guilty of publishing seditious material under British law; jury acquitted him, saying no man should be imprisoned or fined for publishing criticism of the government that was both truthful and fair

- William Blackstone's Commentaries on the Law of England (1765-1769): A primary source for understanding free speech issues during the Revolutionary period; argued against prior restraint and systematically explored categories under which prior restraint might be allowed

Theories

- Absolutist theory: The strict interpretation of the First Amendment section that says, "Congress shall make no law... abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press"
- Ad hoc balancing theory: Rights can and often do conflict; proposes that rights in conflict should be weighed against each other on an equal footing
- Preferred position balancing theory: Similar to the ad hoc balancing theory but proposes that First Amendment rights should be given more weight in the balancing process and that other rights need to have a much stronger argument to overcome First Amendment rights
- Rational relationship: Whereas the preferred position balancing theory gives priority to First Amendment rights, this theory gives preference to government regulation as long as the government can show a substantial interest and that the regulation is reasonably related to that interest
- Compelling state interest: Rights that are more fundamental to a society receive a preferred position
- Marketplace of ideas: In an environment of wide-open debate, truth will rise to the top, and the solution to prior restraint is not to restrict debate but to encourage it
- Access theory: Not all people have equal access to having their voices heard; government has a responsibility to ensure fairness in terms of access
- Utilitarian theory: Free speech and free press should be protected if they aid in the process of successful self-government; determining what types of speech and press relate to the self-governing process is crucial
- Self-realization: Speech is important to the individual, regardless of its impacts or benefits; speech is inherently valuable and should be protected

MEDIUMS & FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

- The First Amendment does not treat all mediums equally
 - Print: When the First Amendment talks about freedom of "the press," the framers literally meant the printing press — not journalists, as we might conceive of the word today
 - Historically, this has meant that print has been afforded the highest levels of First Amendment protection
 - Broadcast: Radio and television receive lesser levels of protection
 - The contrast can be seen in Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo (1974), addressing newspapers, and in Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC (1969), addressing radio, with respect to the notion of a right of reply
 - The courts found that newspapers did not have a right but broadcasters did
 - Broadcast use of the spectrum also justifies regulating broadcast in the public interest
 - Internet: ACLU v. New (1997) wrestled with whether the Internet was more like print or broadcasting
 - The Supreme Court decided the Internet was more like print mediums and thus was deserving of the highest levels of First Amendment protection
 - This has made it difficult for Congress to pass legislation concerning the restriction of Internet content
 - Film: At first, film was not granted First Amendment protection (Mutual Film Corp. v. Industrial Commission of Ohio [1915])
 - Film censorship boards were common at the state and local levels, and producers faced the dilemma of potentially having to make changes to movies that differed across multiple markets
 - The Hays Office and the Hays Code nationalized film censorship
 - In Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson (1952), the Supreme Court recognized that film was a significant medium for the communication of ideas and afforded film First Amendment protection
 - The MPAA rating system, which originated in 1968, is industry self-regulation of content
 - New technologies are constantly pushing media law and stretching the limits of free speech and free press; examples include how to respond to terrorism without infringing on civil liberties, how to address widely disseminated and global entities such as WikiLeaks, and how to address privacy issues raised by social media and portable technologies
