

Productivity Issues in Canada: A Review Article

Ian A. Stewart*

One can begin the review of the volume Productivity Issues in Canada edited by Someshwar Rao and Andrew Sharpe¹ with the first and easiest of conclusions. It is hard to imagine any serious scholar or student of productivity issues who would not wish to have it among the essential works in the reference section of their library. And though much of the applied analysis in the volume is directed at Canadian and Canadian/U.S. issues and comparisons, 10 of the 25 papers collected here survey and review a world literature. Their collected bibliographies alone provide an essential trail for anyone coming fresh to the complex of issues that pervade productivity analysis. These reviews are written by some of the leading scholars in the field and are a careful education in their own right. Further, an introductory chapter written by the editors provides a review of the principal findings of each of the papers as well as an overall assessment of the outstanding and unsettled issues emerging both from the papers and from their close association with the field more generally.

The volume is published in the Industry Canada Research Series and is one in an extended series of publications emerging from this department of the Canadian government reflecting its commitment to analytical work, focussed particularly on productivity analysis. As noted, 25 papers (11 of which have been previously published) are collected in six sections. The sections are entitled: Productivity Trends and Determinants; Innovation and Productivity; Investment and Productivity; Productivity in the New Economy; Global Linkages and Productivity and Social Aspects of Productivity. The author of the lead paper in each section was asked to pull together the main findings of the papers in the section, integrate results of other Canadian and international research in the area, identify important research gaps, and identify research and policy implications of the key empirical findings from existing research.

Many papers address the apparent widening of the Canada-US labour productivity and real income gap in the 1990s. From the papers and from the theoretical reviews generally, one can perhaps do no better than quote the editors' own succinct conclusions:

"accurate measurement of productivity is critical to understanding and analyzing Canada's productivity problems and developing appropriate policies and strategies; Canada has lost significant ground in productivity and real income to the United States in the 1990s; Canada needs to pursue effective policies and strategies to close the innovation gap; the ICT-producing sector contributed in a major
