The Reorganization of the Library of Congress, 1939-44*

ARCHIBALD MACLEISH

THIS paper, being a library paper, should begin with a warning to the cataloger. The author is not Archibald MacLeish, though the by-line says so. The author is the Library of Congress. It would be almost impossible for the most gifted and persistent cataloger on earth, even though a member of the Library's staff (which she certainly would be), to identify the occasional sentences I have borrowed from the reports of my colleagues—Mr. Clapp, or Mr. Mearns, or Dr. Evans, or Mr. Henkle, or Dr. Hanke, or Mr. Rogers, or Mrs. Wright, perhaps, or other members of the Library's staff. The reorganization of the Library of Congress was a labor in common of many men and women, and this account of it is such a labor also. If the general orders and other documents in which the Library's organization was accomplished and expressed were generally in my words, it was not because the work was necessarily mine but rather because, being a writer rather than a librarian, I prefer the sound of my own phrases. If the manuscript of this paper is largely in my handwriting, it is merely because mine were the last hands through which it passed.

I insist on this not out of modesty but out of pride. Of the various changes accomplished in my five-year term, I am proudest of the change which has drawn into the active administration of the Library of Congress an increasing number of the members of its staff. A department of government is efficiently run when it is run by every man and woman in it, each directing the work he has to do, whether that work is done by many or by one, and that one himself. The Library of Congress has not yet achieved that ideal; but the professional forum, the staff advisory committee, the various operating committees, and the Librarian's Conference have carried it a long way forward. I could ask no greater assurance for the future welfare of the Library than its continuing development of these instruments and others like them.

But if the author of this paper is not what he seems, neither is the paper. It calls itself "The Reorganization of the Library of Congress, 1939-44." The implication is that the new Librarian of Congress, having just heard himself certified by the American Library Association as no librarian, took one look at the world's largest library and proceeded to reconstruct it from the ground up. Nothing of the kind, I need hardly say, happened, I did not set out to reorganize the Library of Congress, any more than I had set out to become its Librarian. The American Library Association was quite right. I knew nothing about library administration as such in 1939. To be entirely frank, I am not sure that I know much more about it today, for I am even more doubtful now than I was then that
