

N3481 Exam 1 Study Guide

- Discuss cognitive reframing and its impact on negative and irrational thought processes, discuss how reframing distorted thoughts helps with certain anxiety disorders and identify situations where this therapeutic tool might be most useful.
 - Cognitive reframing is used to change the individual's perception of stress by reassessing a situation and replacing irrational beliefs with more positive self-statements. When the perception of the situation is changed, the sympathetic nervous system is not as stimulated, which decreases anxiety and stress. This technique can be used in any situation where the patient is experiencing negative thoughts from anxiety or depression. It reframes their thoughts to be more productive, which lowers their sympathetic response.
- Discuss the characteristics of negative thinking in depression the tendency to overgeneralize and identify associated responses, interventions and supportive measures the nurse could employ.
 - Characteristics (Beck's Cognitive Triad)
 - A negative, self-deprecating view of self: "I really never do anything well; everyone else seems smarter."
 - A pessimistic view of the world: "Once you're down, you can't get up. Look around, poverty, homelessness, sickness, war, and despair are every place you look."
 - The belief that negative reinforcement (or no validation for the self) will continue: "It doesn't matter what you do; nothing ever gets better. I'll be in this stupid job the rest of my life."
 - Interventions
 - Cognitive Behavioral Theory
 - Identifying and testing negative cognition
