

Indicators of academic readiness for college: Evaluating an advanced Spanish language program

Jill Landes-Lee¹ | Johanna Watzinger-Tharp²

The Challenge

K-16 language education models carry the potential to benefit students with language proficiency, with 21st-century skills, and may serve as a gateway for multilingual students from dual language immersion, advanced placement (AP), and heritage language pathways to access advanced coursework that supports college and career success. Can advanced world language study in high school help prepare students for college? How do we measure the college readiness of high school students?

Abstract

Students who participate in advanced coursework in high school are more likely to enroll and persist in college. This study measured college readiness indicators of high school seniors enrolled in the Utah Spanish Bridge Program and analyzed whether performance differed based on race/ethnicity or on parent college completion. Findings show that race/ethnicity played a role in inequitable distribution of college readiness indicators to a larger extent than parent college completion. Hispanic students, although enrolled in advanced coursework at a higher rate than the school overall, were still at a disadvantage compared with their White peers. Findings can inform programs to improve educational outcomes and may suggest areas for future research.
