Conoley, Jane Close and Conoley, Collie W. School Consultation: A guide to practice and training. New York: Pergamon Press, 1982.

Samuel F. Broughton

In School Consideration: A Guide to Practice and Training, the Conoley's have prepared a brief, terse, well written, informative, easy-to-read introduction to school consultation. The authors' obvious familiarity with the consultation literature, the consultation experience, and training issues is evident in every facet of the book.

The organization of the chapters within the book follows a logical sequence. Each chapter is well organized and clearly written. Good use is made of tables within chapters to summarize and consolidate major points. Three of the nine chapters contain appendices of relevant example forms, procedures, checklists, or evaluation instruments. Eight of the chapters are followed by lists of suggested readings containing from four to nine references presented in annotated bibliography style. The chapters themselves are well referenced, and good case examples are distributed throughout the book to illustrate basic principles and important points.

The first chapter defines consultation and provides a description of basic characteristics and objectives. Four models of consultation are briefly described (mental health, behavioral, process, and advocacy). Although organization development is not presented as a model, it is covered as part of the process model. Chapter two provides a description of necessary personal qualities and interpersonal skills. Suggestions for developing or training these skills are also given. The four models mentioned earlier are covered in more detail in chapter three, coverage of each model is still brief, and an additional chapter provides an excellent basic framework for conceptualizing each of the models, however the fourth chapter voices the critical and often neglected issue of evaluation. This is covered primarily from an assessment standpoint rather than from a research design orientation. Other references will again be necessary to cover field research design issues. Chapter five provides very helpful information on how to enter the consulting relationship, negotiate a contract, and quickly assess the organization situation being entered. Suggestions for in-service training activities are covered in chapter six, while chapter seven discusses methods for moving from direct to indirect services and how to overcome the barriers to indirect services. Chapter eight is a series of consultation transcripts illustrating the use of the four models discussed throughout, and chapter nine covers ethical considerations.

This book is most appropriate for use in a first course on consultation. It should be most useful in helping students organize information. It also has good suggestions for skill training that instructors should find helpful. The orientation of the book is heavily weighted toward practical applications and basic skills. While the book is well referenced a critical review of the consultation literature is not provided. A more academic approach to the subject will
