

Nurses, nursing and political action—Joining the dots to realize our power

Firstly, a profound “thank you” for your compassionate, unrelenting work over the past nearly 3 years. I acknowledge your resilience and your exhaustion.

Unapologetically, however, I am going to suggest something more for you to do. Not everyone will take up this challenge now, but it is important you read on and think carefully about the issues raised.

What I ask you to think about is politics and the inextricability of politics and our caring for patients, families and the health of communities.

Let us begin with what I know you know.

1 | WHAT WE, AS NURSES, KNOW

Every preservice nursing programme introduces students to definitions of nursing. The words “strength, will and knowledge” are an indelible trilogy etched into our professional identity. They are our foundations of preventative and restorative health care—those attributes which we lend to people who, temporarily, cannot perform for themselves the necessary health-related activities. I’m sure we can all reel off the four domains of our profession: nurse, person, health, environment or some slight variation of wording therein.

We know about social determinants of health and the negative sequelae for health of poverty, poor education, lack of meaningful work, dislocation from place and more (Marmot, 2005). We know about the sustainable development goals and that health is inextricably linked to all other 16 goals—clean water, sanitation, clean air, clean energy, etc. (<https://sdgs.un.org/goals>).

We know specifically about climate change and its impact on low-lying areas, particularly of the Pacific Rim and its impact on food source and production, on heat exposure and dislocation from traditional lands “disproportionally affecting marginalised and underserved communities” (WHO, 2021).

We KNOW an awful lot of important information that relates directly to our job as health professionals, but in what way do we bring forward this knowledge to shape our conscious actions. Are we as guilty as the person to whom we have provided specific patient education but for whom there is no behavioural change? They KNOW, but still they do not DO. We may remember two of our domains of knowledge are Health and Environment but how often do we return to these and explore their meaning for contemporary practice? We may remember Virginia Henderson’s “strength, will and knowledge” but do we also recall her going on to speak of nurses as “the mouth-piece for those too weak or withdrawn to speak” (Henderson, 1955). Do we speak up, do we use our individual and collective voices making loud and clear that which we know about health?

I challenge myself and you all to contemplate how we can and should use this professional knowledge for personal and professional action—for change—for political praxis. If politics is the influence on the negotiation, contested rationing and allocation of scarce resources at every level—the unit, the health service, the state, the country and globally—then every action, or inaction, is inherently a political act. How do we more authentically join the dots between what we know, what our mandate from society is in relation to health and illness, and what our everyday actions demonstrate?

2 | JOINING THE DOTS IN NURSING PRACTICE

As nurses, we are the great disposers. We determine what is waste and where it goes. We choose what goes in “clinical waste” bins, in recycling bins and general waste. We disconnect the IV tubing and throw it... somewhere; we discard the dressing pack with only minimal contents used. We contribute to the decision that all ER patients have cannulas “just in case” they are needed, leaving the majority unused and binned. We contribute millions of tons to landfill and the disposal of expensive “clinical waste” (five times more expensive to dispose of).

There are simple things nurses all around the world are beginning to do in relation to hospital waste and recycling. Hospitals and health services are signing up to organizations such as the “Global Green and Healthy Hospitals” (<https://greenhospitals.org>), coordinated in the Pacific region by Climate and Health Alliance (<https://caha.org.au>) and nurses are often the local champions leading these initiatives. For example, at Fiona Stanley Hospital in Perth, Australia commingled syringe and PVC recycling bins are used to collect materials which are granulated and made into pellets for repurposing. Royal Melbourne Hospital, Australia operating theatres have separate bins for cardboard and paper, for glass and plastics, for aluminium, batteries and PVC leading to significant financial savings and material repurposing. Starting simple and educating for mindfulness in everyday actions and making it easy for busy staff to do the right thing seem to be secrets to success.
