

[70% of PMS implementations fail — 10 best practices to beat the odds]

80% of all insurance firms intend to adopt or replace their PMS before 2027, with 60% of P&C carriers developing new platform systems or major enhancements to existing systems within 2026.

If a carrier wants to beat the odds and successfully transition from a function-oriented legacy system to an enterprise-wide platform, they must understand the challenges and best practices associated with PMS implementation.

Mind the gaps — 10 reasons why most P&S implementations fail

Before beginning a PMS implementation, carriers must first examine why so many PMS implementations fail. The risks to start an implementation is often based on a very specific problem, rather than the need for an overall system or organizational solution. Carriers may find themselves with PMS a tactical system update or other minor technology interventions, before key decision makers realize that a total system replacement may be necessary.

Even when the process starts out well, unexpected hurdles may arise during the course of the implementation. Carriers often face changing priorities, scope creep and budget overruns for the project, as industry best practices and the regulatory & compliance landscape change. Another common source of significant scope creep is jumping straight to detailed requirements gathering, without defining the overall business vision.

of the target operating model the PMS platform is expected to support. A failure in communicating the broader vision with the development teams may cause them to produce architecture disconnected from target goals, resulting in delays and/or failure to user acceptance. If employee concerns are not addressed early on in the implementation, staff members may become worried whether automated processes or other functions will make their jobs obsolete. This may cause a distracted workforce and loss of project support.

Even if carriers make it to the end of the program, they may realize that multiple
