ABSTRACT

To assess the environmental significance of pesticide residues in soil and plants one must distinguish between two types of residues: those that are extractable with solvents, and those residues that are not extractable with solvent. The extent of bound (non-extractable) residues varies with the plant and pesticide involved and generally increases with time after treatment. Bound pesticide residues have been detected in the organic matter fractions of soil, i.e. humic acid, fulvic acid, and humin. Several studies have shown that lignin, hemicellulose and pectic polysaccharide are the major bound residues fraction of pesticide in plants.

Attempts have been made to extract bound pesticide residues by the milder to harsher methods. Drastic extractive procedures destroy the structure of soil or plants often results in the destruction of the identity of bound residues. The High Temperature Distillation (HTD) and Supercritical Fluid Extraction (SFE) techniques may provide possible means for extraction and identification of bound residues in food products. Regulatory agencies should also consider placing further emphasis on employing more effective extraction techniques and procedures to quantitatively remove bound residues.

Key words: bound pesticide residues, supercritical fluid extraction
