How had the Soviets been able to make this success? This was the question which appeared before us. The German side all preparations had been taken and the attack had to be kept the secret. Naturally, it was necessary to make all preparations from Soviet aerial reconnaissance. The attack was to be in the direction of the front, especially down in the area of the German Luftwaffe High Command had done everything to prevent the concentration of 1200 aircraft, about 1000 of which were light aircraft, and 200 heavy fighters immediately before the front line.

This had not been an easy task. After all, the 1st Air Corps had to be moved into position for the northern sector in the East area, and in the south, in the Kharkov area, VIII Air Corps with its 1200 aircraft and I Tank Corps, reinforced by a SS brigade, had to be brought up.

The 1200 aircraft within Stavroski's sphere of command alone is spread 20 miles in the Kharkov area. That was a dangerous matter.

The aircraft were parked as best as they could as possible, and surrounded with makeshift anti-aircraft screens. Besides, and last, but not least, to make camouflage by means of nets and ditches, thereby from the air every day, were to make aerial reconnaissance very difficult.

To make detection more difficult was one thing—but to hide such a concentration of air power altogether was impossible. Even the fact that the bulk of the machines were not to arrive at the forward field until the night before the attack was not likely to deceive any reasonably efficient aerial reconnaissance. Besides, what was the use of it? One measure if the enemy knew the whereabouts of the best thing was to suppress espionage inside the Führer's headquarters.

The Soviets knew the date and the general plan of the German offensive. And they knew only too well that ground operations would be supported by massive blows from the air. Knowledge of the true points of the offensive, together with the results of aerial reconnaissance, gave them a good idea of the German preparations for the attack.

At first light on 26 July, as the heaviest formations of the 1st
