Background and Importance: Spontaneous uterine rupture, especially in an unscarred uterus, is a rare pregnancy complication that can cause severe morbidity and mortality in both the mother and the fetus. The vast majority of uterine ruptures occur in the presence of a previous uterine scar, most commonly from a previous cesarean delivery. To our knowledge, here we reported the first case of spontaneous rupture of unscarred uterus in a term primigravida secondary to lethal skeletal dysplasia fetus (Type I Thanatophoric dysplasia) faced by a practicing clinician in an underdeveloped country (Somalia) with a successful outcome.

Case Presentation: The patient was 24 yrs. Old Primigravida, at 40 weeks gestation by LMP, presented with abdominal pain and active vaginal bleeding; she did not receive antenatal care during pregnancy; after initial abdominal ultrasonography and vaginal examination, laparotomy was performed due to high suspicion of uterine rupture. After dead fresh fetal extraction, the uterine defect was repaired successfully, and the patient was discharged home in good condition after several days.

Conclusion: Through this case, we would like to highlight the urgent need to focus on and recognize the importance of receiving antenatal care in the community so that the burden of thousands of lives lost each year can be reduced.

Spontaneous uterine rupture is a rare pregnancy complication.¹ Its occurrence may result in significant morbidity and mortality in both the fetus and the mother.⁶ The diagnosis of spontaneous uterine rupture is often missed or delayed.⁷ The main risk factor for uterine rupture is a history of a previous cesarean section (the “scarred uterus”).^{8,9} Most spontaneous ruptures happen during labor and usually involve the lower segment of the uterus.^{10,11} According to research by the World Health Organization (WHO), the incidence of rupture of an unscarred uterus is 1/8000 to 15,000 deliveries or 0.006%.¹² Uterine rupture is more prevalent and remains a major obstetric complication in resource-poor countries.^{4,13} In resource-poor nations, including Somalia, uterine rupture is more frequently associated with obstructed labor, inappropriate use of uterine stimulants (often performed by untrained birth attendants), lack of antenatal care, grand
