Another omission which surprised me is the very practical notion of using existing library orientation and workshop programmes for library users, principally students, as a basis upon which to build the additional training required by student library assistants. The incorporation of these workshops into the training programme not only saves staff time, but has the additional virtue of helping to solve two of the problems dealt with in the book, namely the varying levels of library-literacy of potential assistants and the need to ensure that all employees have a good sense of the overall scope and purpose of library service.

Despite these omissions, this book will be extremely useful to those who need to establish or evaluate their training practice. Whether many supervisors will be able to devote so much effort and care to the employment and training of very temporary staff is unfortunately open to question.

Each of the seven chapters, from "Audiences to Be Served" to "The Professional Role and Responsibilities of the Children's Librarian" closely adhere to this statement. Furthermore, the reader is informed that attention will be devoted to the design of "a program of services compatible with the mission of the library and the needs of the community", and to the integration of "the children's program into that of the overall library". Finally, "Attention is also given to the role of the children's librarian in those activities that affect the library as a whole: planning, goal setting, policy development, budgeting, and staff training".

One of the strengths of the book resides in its underlying marketing approach. The first chapter, "Audiences to Be Served", sets the scene. Children's librarians cannot and should not attempt any collection development, programs, or any other actions without a thorough knowledge of the community to be served. This involves not only the community's children, but also the establishment of close relationships with any child-caring adults who "may wear many hats", as well as any agencies serving chil-
