Abstract: It is vital to enforce the distinguished assimilation of sustainability entities in higher education (HE) and establish an academia-wide collective curriculum on sustainability in an efficient manner, in order to disseminate and stimulate thoughts with forthcoming generations. The remit of this paper is to document the available literature and map the research landscape into a coherent taxonomy. This research adds to the available literature; moreover, it could also aid in the community comprehension of education in sustainable development (ESD) implementation and/or integration into higher education institutions (HEIs). We perform an attentive search in relation to education sustainable development (ESD) in three relevant electronic databases, namely, Web of Science (WoS), ScienceDirect and IEEE Xplore. The result of the review is a taxonomy that includes 148 articles published between early 2014 and mid-2019 that were then categorized into six classes, namely, the accomplishment of SD, awareness and commitment, evaluation and commentary, structural transformation, course coordination and university management. Additionally, we acknowledge varied involvement from different levels of communities supporting and promoting education to achieve sustainable development (SD).

Keywords: education sustainable development (ESD); sustainable development (SD); sustainable education (SE); higher education institution/s (HEIs); Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs); environmental education (EE)

1. Introduction

To ensure a better world, world leaders approved the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development during the United Nations Sustainable Development Summit in 2015. The objectives of this agenda are to end poverty, injustice, inequality and climate change before 2030. The three pillars of sustainable development are: (1) social, (2) environmental, and (3) economic, and each of the pillars overlap. The goals of sustainable development can only be achieved if there is a balance or exchange between the pillars.

Principally, education for sustainable development (ESD) integrates the message of sustainable development during sessions of teaching and learning, such as to stimulate and equip students to make decisions that benefit sustainability, as discussed by [1,2]. For example, ESD is able to authorize people to distinguish differences in their point of view and collaborate with others to achieve a sustainable future environment, making our world a safer place. In addition, UNESCO has urged higher education institutions (HEIs) to play their collective role, in order to achieve the targets of Sustainable Development Goals, a topic that was previously covered by [3,4]. The study of [5] stated that more
