Natural Systems for Development: What Planners Need to Know

Edited by Richard A. Cooper. Alhambra Publishing Company, 565 Third Avenue, New York, NY 10016, 1983. 407 p. $27.95.

This book is an ecological-oriented view of how natural systems are affected by a wide range of development activity. The 24 sections and chapters from Asia, the Pacific, and the United States and special insight into discussions of a wide variety of topics that should be considered in natural resource development projects. Almost all discussions and examples in this book illustrate situations in developing countries. Most chapters follow a similar format: A general concern or problem is identified; the important physical, chemical, biological processes are discussed; and management approaches are suggested and usually followed by a bibliography. Each chapter also has a limited reference.

Most chapters cover selected topics that are pertinent to many types of development. Chapter 1 discusses the responsibility of planners in the development of tropical rain forests. This chapter sets the "background" with development" level of the rain forest. The role of forests in ecological processes is covered in chapter 2. Topics of the hydrologic cycle are followed by a discussion of how development activity affects forest and watersheds. Chapter 3 discusses the process of soil erosion by water, emphasizing the use of the Universal Soil Loss Equation in development countries. Although this chapter is somewhat technical, the case studies given considerable detail to explain the use of USLE. Tables listing the USLE erosion factors for the tropics will be especially helpful to planners from this region. A relatively technical discussion of soil salinization is found in chapter 4; the authors use a very good job covering this difficult topic. This chapter includes helpful tables listing crop tolerance levels and salinity classification classes for soil and water. Chapter 5 discusses the use and management of arid and coastal ecosystems. Particular attention is given to the evaluation of the effects of various development activities on eight types of ecosystems. Insect pest outbreaks and control measures are found in chapter 6. Most of this chapter chapter is integrated pest management (IPM) approach to pest control through control case studies. Urban air pollution and water pollution are covered in chapters 7 and 8, respectively. Both chapters for the kinds, sources, and effects of major pollutants. Management approaches to pollution control receive adequate treatment for air pollution but are not well covered for water pollution. The final chapter describes the LANDSAT satellite remote sensing system. The generally non-technical discussion of LANDSAT includes both applications and the various data's handling tool.

This book is a good overview of many, but certainly not all, environmental issues that must be addressed while developing natural systems. Even though most chapters were written by different authors, each with different styles and levels of detail, the book is uniform and edited well. However, there is some repetition of material between chapters. For example, a similar figure describing the life cycle of the salmonids can be found in both chapters 6 and 8. Although helpful references can be found at the end of each chapter, unfortunately no direct citations are made in the text. Useful use of separate chapters present complex relationships in concise terms. This book will be a helpful, practical guide and reference for natural planners and policy makers working in developing countries. —TED M. DUBOISE, Dept. of Agronomy, Ohio State University, Columbus, OH 43210.

Hazardous Waste Land Treatment

Edited by Kirk W. Brown, Gordon S. Evers, Jr., and Beth D. Frazier. Butterworth Publishers, 68 West Avenue, Norwood, MA 02062, 1982. 447 p. $49.00.

The technology of land treatment readily encompasses a wide array of increasingly varied alternatives for the management of industrial and municipal wastes, wastewater, and sludge. This book is the first of its kind to look at land treatment and report a very significant perspective—on a national scale, the use of land treatment as a remedial device.

All the methods present through the text, together are made of the approach by which a land treatment system must be selected and designed—its design, construction, and a design. The book is the first of its kind to provide detailed, clear, valuable assistance in given or other design or systems. The expanded sections regarding design and operation, provide valuable information, based on the author's experience, for the important implementation phase of land treatment.
