

Melting and solidification points of fats...

The molecular structure and saturation of fats affect their melting points. Most fats have a melting 'range', rather than a melting point, depending on which fatty acids are present.

Generally, the more carbon atoms a fat has... the higher the melting point.
The more hydrogen atoms present... the higher the melting point.

Margarine (a monounsaturated fat) melts at 25°C; butter (a saturated fat) melts at 33°C; Crisco (a hydrogenated fat) melts at 47°C.

The solidification point, the temperature at which a melted fat regains its original firmness, is lower than its original melting range. Fats created with 2 or 3 very similar fatty acids will re-solidify with a grainy texture.
