We can also physically separate a solid from a liquid by filtration, a method that involves pouring the mixture onto a porous material, such as filter paper. The solid, called the residue, is unable to pass through the pores in the filter paper, so it is retained on the paper. The liquid, which passes through the paper, is called the filtrate.

Evaporation is a third physical separation method, in which a solution is heated to vaporize and thus remove the solvent. The solid remaining after we have evaporated the solvent was the solute.

When one component of a binary mixture of two solids is soluble in a particular solvent, and the other component is not, we can separate the components using a fourth physical method, extraction. We add the
