Abstract

A method of producing holograms of three-dimensional (3D) optical pulses is proposed. It is shown that both the amplitude and the phase profile of 3D optical pulse can be stored in dynamic perturbations of a Raman medium, such as plasma. By employing Raman scattering in a nonlinear medium, information carried by a laser pulse can be captured in the form of a slowly propagating low-frequency wave that persists for a time large compared with the pulse duration. If such a hologram is then probed with a short laser pulse, the information stored in the medium can be retrieved in a second scattered electromagnetic wave. The recording and retrieving processes can conserve robustly the pulse shape, thus enabling the recording and retrieving with fidelity of information stored in optical signals. While storing or reading the pulse structure, the optical information can be processed as an analog or digital signal, which allows simultaneous transformation of 3D continuous images or computing discrete arrays of binary data. By adjusting the phase fronts of the reference pulses, one can also perform focusing, redirecting, and other types of transformation of the output pulses.

1. Introduction

Holographic methods of recording and retrieving wave fields were first proposed about 50 years ago [1,2]. Conventional techniques of holography are based on recording both the amplitude and the phase information of an input light wave into static perturbations of the refraction coefficient of photoemulsion. The perturbations are driven by the static beating of an input signal and a reference recording wave. After the pattern is imprinted into photoemulsion, it can be retrieved by scanning the hologram with another reference wave of the same frequency. In such a static hologram, the information is “carved” in static perturbations of the medium, so that only one holographic image can be stored within a given sample.
