Many Americans agree that religious rights are important. The fact of religious freedom is widely accepted and, according to surveys, 90% agree that the religious freedom of every citizen is important and should be protected. However, that does not mean that the issue of religious rights is equally widely protected. Many agree that some forms of religious expression, such as and especially gay, lesbian, and transgender issues, are not protected and should not be. Indeed, in general surveys, 40% of those who are in political parties, churches, and other institutions, the general public, believe in political parties, churches, and other institutions which do not have full religious freedom. In fact, religious freedom is not protected in the workplace, in the military, in the government, in the education system, and in the courts. In fact, many Americans believe that religious freedom is not protected in the workplace, in the military, in the government, in the education system, and in the courts.

In a recent, but unpublished, survey, I found that 40% of Americans believe that religious freedom is not protected in the workplace, in the military, in the government, in the education system, and in the courts.

INTRODUCTION

In a paper I am submitting, I argue that all citizens have a responsibility to defend and protect religious expression, especially of their own religious expression, and efforts to protect religious expression are all good. This includes all political, social, and other efforts to defend religious expression. This paper will argue that all efforts should be directed at protecting all groups. Journal of Church and Society is dedicated to the defense of religious expression. The Journal of Church and Society is a journal of religious expression of the right of all to participate in public life, the responsibility of all to protect religious expression.
