The Tangled Field: Barbara McClintock's Search for the Patterns of Genetic Control by Nathaniel C. Comfort. Cambridge, Mass., USA, and London, England: Harvard University Press, 2001. 352 pp. $39.95. ISBN 0674004566.

Think "Fluid Genome" and most scientists with a memory of recent molecular genetics think "Barbara McClintock". She is the grandmother of the field of genetic transposons or mobile genetic elements (Shapiro, 1995), and this biography documents her extraordinary scientific life and achievements.

A testimony to her legacy is the ubiquity of "retrotransposition". Such reverse transcriptase-mediated events have had an enormous impact on shaping the genomic DNA sequence landscape and regulating gene expression during development (eg. coat color in mice, see Morgan et al., 1999). Indeed, the molecular record shows that at least 40% of the mammalian genome has overtly accumulated DNA sequences via an RNA intermediate over evolutionary time (Kazazian, 2000) and a significant fraction of this load constitutes intronless functional genes, such as those encoding olfactory receptors (Brosius, 1999). Evidence from our laboratory suggests that covert and targeted soma-to-germline retrotransposition has played a key role in the evolution of the variable (V) gene families of the vertebrate immune system (Steele & Ehlken, 2000; Steele et al., 2002). Moreover, mouse spermatozoa are endowed with retrotransposon-encoded reverse transcriptase activity, enabling sperm cells to reverse transcribe exogenous RNA molecules into cDNA copies that can be delivered to embryos during fertilization (Giordano et al., 2000). More recently, Patrick Fogarty of Tox Inc. (Santa Cruz, CA) has established that Weismann's 'Barrier'—the 19th century 'law' protecting the soma from the germline (Steele, 1979; Steele et al., 1998)—can be readily penetrated in mice and targeted to specific loci using novel DNA transposon-based gene delivery vectors (Fogarty, 2002).

A new paradigm is therefore emerging to replace the traditional static neo-Darwinian view, allowing us to now confidently embrace Shapiro's conclusion that transposable genetic elements will be a key plank in our understanding of evolution as the 21st century unfolds (Shapiro, 2000). Indeed, horizontal gene transfer has been a common and dominant feature of genomic evolution from bacteria to man (Gogarten, 2003), and transposable elements are now considered a key factor in the evolution of eukaryotic complexity (Bowen & Jordan, 2002).

In the space of 50 years—since McClintock (1950) first published her results on mobile controlling elements in maize—the old view of evolution has been changed beyond recognition. James A. Shapiro, a key player in establishing the reality of mobile genetic elements in bacteria during the 1960s and 1970s, has aptly summed up the current situation as follows:
