

REPRODUCTION IN VERTEBRATES

Introduction:

Reproduction is a biological process during which a living organism produces offspring (children). It is a characteristic of all living organisms and Vertebrates are animals having a backbone. A successful reproduction is very important to ensure the continued existence of the species. Different animals use various reproductive strategies to increase their reproductive success in the environment. There are two main types of reproductive strategies, the r-strategy and k-strategy.

The r-strategy

- Some animals expend more energy in giving birth to many offspring, but spend little time in parental care.
- Many of these offspring will die before the adulthood, but enough number will survive to continue the species.

The k-strategy

- Some animals expend less energy in giving birth to fewer offspring but spend more time on parental care.
- Many of these offspring will survive to adulthood.

FERTILISATION

There are two fertilisation strategies, the External and Internal fertilisations.

The external fertilisation

- The external fertilisation takes place outside the female's body.
- It occurs most on the aquatic animals such as fishes and amphibians (animals that lives both on land and water such as frogs).
- Very little behaviour is required between male and female.
- This type of fertilisation requires water for prevent gametes (egg and sperm cell) from drying out.

The internal fertilisation

- The internal fertilisation takes place inside the female's body
- It occurs mostly on insects and terrestrial animals such as humans, cow, etc.
- There is large cooperative between male and female.
- This type of fertilisation does not require water

OVIARY, OVOVIVIPARY AND VIVIPARY

a Ovipary

Ovipary shows that eggs hatch outside the body. In oviparous animals, the embryo develops in an egg outside the female's body.

Oviparous aquatic animals

- Fertilisation takes place externally in the water.
- The developing embryo is surrounded and protected by a jelly-like layer.
- Large number of gametes are produced.
- These animals include fishes and amphibians.

Oviparous terrestrial animals

- Fertilisation takes place internally.
- The developing embryo is surrounded and protected by shell.
- Fewer number of gametes are produced.
- These animals include birds, mammals and some reptiles.

b Ovovivipary

Ovovivipary shows that eggs hatch inside the body. In ovovivipary, the embryo develops in an egg inside the female's body.

- Internal fertilisation takes place.
- The embryo is surrounded by thin membranous shell inside the female's body.
- Fewer number of gametes are produced.
- These animals include snakes and some sharks.

c Vivipary

Vivipary shows that the offspring are born alive.

- Internal fertilisation takes place.
