

Communication Disorders in Children

Many children will experience a temporary delay in speech and language development, but eventually catch up. Others continue to have problems with communication development. The following are common speech and language disorders found in a pediatric population:

What is a Speech Disorder?

A speech disorder is characterized by difficulty with articulation (speech sound production), voice or fluency (the flow of speech). These are described below:

I. Articulation (Speech Sound) Disorders:

Articulation is the physical production of speech sounds in sequence to form spoken words. An articulation disorder is characterized by defective production of individual speech sounds. This can cause poor speech intelligibility. Articulation errors include the following:

- Omissions: Sounds in words and sentences may be completely omitted.
Example: "I go o coo o the bu." (I go to school on the bus.)
"I re a boo." (I read a book.)
- Substitutions: An incorrect (usually easier) sound may be substituted for the correct one.
Example: w/l "I saw a wittle wamb."
t/s "I tee the tun in the ty."
w/r "I have a wed wadio."
d/g "I'm a dood dirl."
- Distortions: An attempt is made at the correct sound but it results in a poor production.
Example: A distorted /s/ sound may whistle, the air may come out the sides of the mouth causing a "slushy" sound or lateral lisp, or the tongue may be thrusting between the teeth causing a frontal lisp.

Causes of articulation disorders may include the following: cleft palate, dental abnormalities, perceptual disorders, hearing loss or oral motor dysfunction. Neurologic disorders that specifically affect articulation include the following:

- Oral Apraxia: Characterized by poor ability to execute voluntary movements of the tongue and lips, or difficulty combining various movements for speech sounds. As a result, speech consists of multiple inconsistent articulation errors.
- Dysarthria: Characterized by a paralysis, paresis or generally poor coordination of the oral musculature. This condition may result in speech that is slow, inaccurate, slurred and hypernasal.
