Abstract: Water project and watershed management is currently being reengineered under digital twin schemes in China through pilot projects. An evaluation on pilot reengineering is important for its further implementation and improvement. This paper investigates national legislation and pilot projects' implementations of a digital twin watershed and digital twin water project from the perspectives of design, policy, technology, investment, personnel, cyberspace security, co-construction, and sharing through interviews and expert review, and it uses a Bayesian network to study their reliability. First, the design of the digital twin watershed and digital twin water project is reasonable with regard to system architecture and business management. Second, although there are some national legislations on cyberspace security and geospatial data, they are incomplete for policy making and are probably infeasible for some technology. Third, there are insufficient mechanisms to sustainably support investment, personnel, and cyberspace security. Fourth, co-construction and sharing are required for both inside and outside water departments. Fifth, the Bayesian network is useful for investigating the reliability of weak nodes, and it is helpful for the design and further implementation of the digital twin watershed and digital twin water project, as will be demonstrated with an anonymous example. This study could provide useful insights into the further reengineering of water projects and watershed management under a digital twin scheme in the world.

1. Introduction

Many industries are currently being reshaped under digital twin schemes [1] like manufacturing [2,3], and even phenomena like the COVID-19 pandemic are analyzed under this framework [4]. The origins of this technology come from physical artifacts predominantly manufactured by artisans in the 18th century using interchangeable parts. Then, companies began mass building and producing copies of their products with the goal of achieving low-unit costs for customized products.

The word twain refers to a copy of a part or product used to infer information about other samples of the same part or product with a relation among copies, and this originated from NASA's Apollo program [5]. Later, over the past decades, advancements in computer technology resulted in the sophisticated simulation of virtual models based on physical artefacts. These models serve the purposes of design [6], manufacturing [7], feedback from operating conditions [8], and so on. Meanwhile, modern sensing routines make the collection of large sets of data from physical artefacts easy, quick, and reliable. And new
