In this book, I present an autopoietic theory of the development of self and the biochemical-organismic processes at the root of the mind that challenges assumptions in present day neuroscience and psychiatry. This theory argues that the biochemistry of the endocrine system is an indispensable foundation for the emergence of embodied self-awareness, integral to the sense of well-being and development of meaning and modulated and influenced by the person's experience of their world. Intracrinological biosynthesis of DHEA and progesterone is shown to impact homeostasis and the functionality of neurotransmitters and neurosteroids that affect well-being and the sense of self. The psychoneuroendocrine hypothesis reveals that the mind is not an epiphenomenon of the brain and creates a paradigm that impacts sciences' understanding of consciousness and human agency. Professionals and students in phenomenology, philosophy, psychiatry, medicine, and interdisciplinary audiences across the sciences and humanities will find this a compelling read on consciousness and the self.
