

RECENT ADVANCES IN CHEMICAL ANTI-PLAQUE AGENTS

* Eapen Thomas, BDS,  S. Anil, MDS

Knowledge concerning the role of micro-organisms in the initiation of gingivitis and progression of periodontitis has increased dramatically following the recognition of bacterial plaque as the major etiological factor in periodontal diseases. In the past few years interest in the use of chemotherapeutic agents in the management of periodontal disease has increased. Plaque control by mechanical means is laborious and time consuming. So chemicals are used as adjuncts to mechanical means. Chemical antiplaque agents have been employed both in prevention and treatment of periodontal disease. However side effects of these agents limit their long term use for prevention. These agents belong to various groups such as Antibiotics, Enzymes, Bis-biguanides, Quaternary Ammonium compounds, Phenolic compounds, Natural products or Plant alkaloids, fluorides, Oxygenating agents, Antiseptics etc. They are available in the form of mouthwashes, gels, lozenges, dentifrices, chewing gums, ointments, periodontal dressings, oral and subgingival irrigations etc. Though various new anti-plaque agents have been developed in the recent years chlorhexidine remains the most effective anti-plaque agent available. Modes of application that have been introduced recently are slow releasing compounds, syringe and pulsated jet irrigation.

In the present talk I would like to make an attempt to review the various chemical antiplaque agents available and their mode of action.
