

NIH: The Price of Neglect

When Bernadine Healy arrives on campus later this year, she will find an institution burdened with low morale and problems that have been allowed to fester

Bethesda, Maryland—THE NOMINATION OF Bernadine Healy as director of the National Institutes of Health has stirred a murmur of optimism within NIH's laboratories and office buildings. But, according to many scientists here, it's the fatigue behind that murmur, rather than the optimism itself, that says the most about the condition of an institution that is widely regarded as the world's premier biomedical research establishment.

It's not that enthusiasm for Healy is lacking. But like long-ignored patients in some deserted hospital ward, many of NIH's more than 1500 intramural researchers seem hardly capable of expressing real exuberance any more. After a year and a half without a director, the federal facility's morale has dipped to an all-time low—"lousy," in the words of one top NIH official.

Indeed, from interviews with more than two dozen NIH intramural researchers and alumni, it's clear that the prolonged absence of a permanent director has spawned or exacerbated a host of problems on campus, leaving a cumulative sense of anger and powerlessness among much of the scientific rank and file.

"We desperately need someone who can effectively speak out for our cause," says a successful, 15-year NIH veteran who, like many of the people interviewed for this story, spoke on the condition that his name not be used. Adds National Cancer Institute researcher Stuart Yuspa, who has watched NIH change since his arrival in 1972: "I've never seen a cloud hanging over this place so strongly. It doesn't hang out in the sky. It hangs out right here in the hallways."

By most measures, NIH would seem to be doing well. The intramural research budget has climbed from $562 million in 1985 to $915 million today, and the labs seem to be bursting with new equipment (see box). However, many researchers say, that healthy budget conceals a subtle and progressive deterioration in several important aspects of scientific support. Among the most pressing concerns voiced by NIH researchers:

- Noncompetitive wages. An ever widening gap between NIH pay scales and those at major universities and private research facilities has made NIH less attractive to the nation's best and brightest young researchers while spurring many senior scientists to jump ship for better paying jobs.

- Increased politicization. Decision-making has shifted from scientists to administrators and politicians, and entire areas of scientific investigation have been declared offlimits because of political sensitivities.

- Accountability fever. The trend toward what some call the "Dingellization" of science, after Representative John Dingell's zealous investigation of purported cases of scientific misconduct, has deeply angered researchers, who feel victimized and unjustly leave to take a position at the University of Texas Southwestern Medical Center in Dallas. David Sachs, chief of NCI's immunology branch, will leave for Harvard in a few weeks. Jesse Roth, director of the division of intramural research at the National Institute of Diabetes and Digestive and Kidney Diseases (NIDDK), leaves this week for Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore. And Michael Frank, chief of the laboratory of clinical investigation at the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases (NIAID), left in December to become chairman of pediatrics at Duke University.

These leading researchers are joining a distinguished list of recent NIH alumni that includes NCI's Michael Lotz, who 6 months ago went to the University of Pittsburgh School of Medicine; NCI's Mark Israel, now at the University of California at San Francisco; John Mulvihill, former director of the Interinstitute Medical Genetics Program, who left last spring for the University of Pittsburgh's graduate school of public health; and NCI's Marc Lippman, who in a highly publicized move took dozens of his co-workers—including star Edward Gelmann—to Georgetown's Lombardi Cancer Center.

To be sure, dissatisfaction with conditions at NIH cannot be blamed for every departure. And it should be noted that many of the institute's problems are not unique to NIH. A nationwide economic downturn, a decade of political conservatism, and a mania for higher standards of public accountability have touched all aspects of American life, hitting the research community particularly hard because of scientists' long-standing sense of transcendence above such mundane concerns as politics and money.

But many NIH insiders, including J. Edward Rall, director of NIH's Office of Intramural Research, feel that the number of top-flight NIH scientists leaving for greener pastures has risen somewhat in recent years. Even more worrisome, says Rall, is that the number of hotshot incoming postdocs—es-accused by a once trusting public.

- Bureaucratization. As goes government, so goes governmental science. Paperwork and red tape threatens to bury the real work of science—and the hiring of new scientists—beneath an ever growing mountain of documentation and formalities.

- Lack of direction. At a time when biomedical science has in many respects entered its most exciting era ever, some say that the NIH intramural program lacks the sense of mission that once characterized the institution.

As an ominous indicator of the cumulative sense of discontent, many researchers point to the recent exodus of an extraordinary number of top NIH scientists. Just last week John Minna, chief of the NCI-Navy medical oncology branch, announced he will soon
