

to break out in a state with nuclear weapons? In the unrestrained atmosphere of civil war, the probability that competing factions would try to use the bomb against each other is very high. An internal nuclear conflict might even spill across international boundaries. Today, such a scenario is more than a distant nightmare in parts of the former Soviet Union. In the West, by way of contrast, nuclear arms have always been under the firm control of stable regimes.

Van Creveld's manifest approval of nuclear proliferation, then, seems totally unwarranted. There isn't a shred of direct evidence to prove that it inhibits full-scale war, and it may actually encourage the growth of more hideous forms of terrorism and guerilla warfare. In the final analysis, the world would be a much safer place if serious steps were taken to stem the further spread of the bomb.

States competing antagonistically have occasionally sought security cooperatively through aerial inspection. Importantly, in the last decade negotiators have woven the practice into the fabric of arms control and packaged it with other confidence-building measures. They see prospects for its further use.

With twelve essays in Open Skies, Arms Control and Cooperative Security, editors Michael Krepon and Amy E. Smithson describe and evaluate aerial inspection, especially the Open Skies Treaty of 1992. They break no ground in theory. Rather they present appropriate questions to ask about the purposes of aerial inspection, variables to consider in calculating policy options, and what to look for in bureaucratic politics during negotiations. The work fills an important niche in the Multilateral Verification Project of the Henry L. Stimson Center, of which Krepon is president and Smithson, a senior associate.

Krepon and Smithson summarize the case for aerial surveillance by saying that it will:
