

The Basic Concepts and Principles of Psychoanalysis

The idea of Psychoanalysis is the notion that people have “unconscious mind” which includes things that are extrinsic or outside of our awareness. These may include early childhood memories, hidden drives and secret desires. This holds things that may be socially unacceptable or unpleasant, because these might cause conflict or suffering. These things are buried in our unconscious mind. They could be outside of our awareness and might keep influencing our thoughts and actions. Another idea is the “conscious mind” which includes everything that are intrinsic or inside of our awareness that can easily bring into consciousness.

PSYCHOANALYSIS

Psychoanalysis is characterized as therapeutic techniques and set of psychological theories initiated by Sigmund Freud (1856-1939). He developed the methods of treatment and general theory of personality. The main cognitive idea of psychoanalysis is that people have unconscious mind, memories, feelings, and desires. This introduced a perspective on psychological illness, which convey that talking with psychologist about certain problem could relieve a person from suffering mental distress.

According to Freud, (1949) psychoanalysis method has important corresponding steps to follow. First, a psychoanalyst collects substantial things which are a product of patients' free associations, results of transference, dream interpretation, and the patients' slips and parapraxes. Second, a psychoanalyst starts to give hypotheses about what occurred to the patients in the past and what is the present occurrence on their day-to-day life. It is also important that the psychoanalyst gives conclusions which are supported upon their observations once
