

Models of Disability

Medical model: Disability seen as disease or trauma and intervention is provided/controlled by professionals. This model ignores the full spectrum of issues related to living with disability and individuals with disabilities are seen as tragic.

Social model: Disability seen as socially constructed meaning that society creates an environment favoring the able-bodied majority. This model views disability as not the fault of the individual but the product of barriers in society.

Rehabilitation model: Similar to the medical model, it views disability as deficiency that needs to be fixed by a professional and people with disabilities are seen as failures if they are unable to overcome the issue.

Interface model: It views disability as existing at the meeting point between the person's medical diagnosis and the environment. Disability is seen as a life experience in which the person with the disability is in control/empowered.

Rights-based model: Disability is viewed as a social-political construct within a rights based dialogue. Emphasis shifted from dependence to independence as people with disabilities have sought a political voice and led social movements.

Tragedy/Charity model: Views people with disabilities as victims of circumstance, deserving pity. This culture of 'care' is potentially dangerous as it leads to medically classifying, segregating and institutionalizing people with disabilities.

Economic model: Disability is defined by a person's inability to participate in, work and contribute to the economy.

Customer/Empowering model: The professional is viewed as a service provider to the client with disability and the client decides and selects what services work best for them.
