

A Cruise on a Modern Ram.

By J. A. GUTHRIE.

SHORT descriptive narrative of the cruise of the United States ram Katahdin, the "only nautical engine of war of its class in the navies of the world," might prove both interesting and instructive to your readers. Of course, to those unacquainted with naval architecture, and such as have their own ideas about the heavy armoured battleships and cruisers, the assertion that we possess the only complete ram, and one, too, capable of weathering storms, would seem paraphrastic; but an investigation and careful examination of the accompanying illustrations will convince the doubting public of the facts of the case. The cruise, an account of which has never been published before, is an actual record of the experience of those on board. To come to essentials, we will commence where the ship first essayed her career only a short time since.

About two years ago, a peculiar type of war vessel was launched at Bath, Maine, and christened Katahdin, after a well-known mountain located in the northern section of that State. It is an aboriginal name, significant and characteristic, as its meaning relates to electric phenomena observed on the summit by the natives. The Indians supposed an enormous creature, with winged claws, dwelt thereon, feasted on human flesh, and emitted fire and smoke from its mouth. They superstitiously venerated this abode of their demure god, and offered propitiatory sacrifices; for, according to their traditional religion, this was absolutely necessary to ward off evil, and shield them from harm and danger. Historic Mount Katahdin was not renowned in American classics as an Olympus or Parnassus, yet it does seem quaintly apposite that such a name, so rich in Indian lore, should be selected for a most destructive war machine, deadly and terrific in attack, swift, strong, and enduring.

In order to comprehend what a ram really is, and by analogy compare this recent addition to our navy with other warships, a brief description may be opportune, so we can understand its qualifications for cruising on the high seas, and its fighting share in the dreadful havoc of war.

The arched armoured deck rising some 5ft. above the water-line forms a protective covering and ironclad roof the entire length and breadth of the ship, varying in thickness 2in. on the crown, gradually increasing to 6in., and fashioned into a cutting edge at or below the water-line as the case may be. The water-line depends upon whether the ship is trimmed for actual warfare or not. When ready for action the trimming tanks are full of water, but otherwise are kept empty. Besides the armoured deck there is a submerged armour belt backed by several feet of solid oak entirely surrounding the ship, as also the air passages, steam and smoke outlets are one and all armoured some distance above the crown of the deck.
