The statement that the left hemisphere controls language is wrong since the activity of the hemisphere is imbalanced. Thus, this is most evident in individuals, where the right hemisphere regulates spatial awareness and manages the opposite side of the brain. In contrast, the left hemisphere handles logical thinking and motor tasks that need step-by-step development (Banich & Compton, 2018). Individuals' right hemispheres (RH) participate in language comprehension in three distinct respects (Banich & Compton, 2018). First, the RH interprets some parts of phonology, which refers to an utterance's intonation structure or sound pulse (Banich & Compton, 2018).

Second, the RH's structuring of semantic knowledge is distinct from the left, offering a broader context in which people's words are examined (Banich & Compton, 2018). Third, the right hemisphere is critical for narrative and reasoning processing (Banich & Compton, 2018). The capacity to develop or comprehend a storyline is referred to as storytelling. Still, the ability to "complete in the spaces" and make conclusions about information not presented is referred to as inference (Banich & Compton, 2018). On the other hand, the left hemisphere (LH) is in charge of logical sequences, such as concocting a stone axe, which advances in series in a particular dimension.

Broca's aphasia occurs when a person's Broca's region or its peripherals are damaged. Broca's aphasics speak slowly, haltingly, and are rarely grammatically correct, as expected by the importance of Broca's region in phonological awareness (Banich & Compton, 2018). However, they are
