

"MRS. GRUNDY"

Of course everyone has his own portrait of Mrs. Grundy, and some idea of the personality she shows to him; but has anyone ever tried to ferret out that disagreeable old woman's own position, to find out where she lives and why she has nothing to do but meddle in affairs which do not concern her? Is she a lady? One would imagine she is not. One would also imagine that she lives in a solid, well-repaired, square brownstone house with a cupola used as a conning tower and equipped with periscope and telescope and wireless. Furthermore, her house is situated on a bleak hill so that nothing impedes her view and that of her two pets, a magpie and a jackal. And the business in life of all three of them is to track down and destroy the good name of every woman who comes within range, especially if she is young and pretty—and unchaperoned! The pretty young woman living alone is their particular quarry. The magpie never leaves her window sill; and the jackal sits on the door mat. And the news of her every going out and coming in, of everyone whom she receives, when they come, how long they stay and at what hour they go, is spread broadcast. And yet if a young woman behaves with natural propriety, she is not likely to bring censure upon herself, even though the gossip of Mrs. Grundy still influences a world which seldom takes the trouble to sift appearance from fact.
