

THE ART OF READABLE WRITING

In other words, whenever you write, you are tempted to use expressions of which you are fond and proud. Usually it will be just these words and phrases that will stop the reader or throw him off. While you are writing you can't spot them; you are too strongly attached to what has just sprung from your mind. But in the cold light of "the morning after" you are able to look at them with a detached reader's eye.

The need for transposing may be harder to see. Sometimes at first writing, we don't always hit on the best arrangement of words for emphasis. The rule is simple enough: The place for emphasis is at the end. But while we write, we have a tendency to overlook the reader's need for sentence rhythm and buildup.

Newspaper lead sentences, with their perverse deliberate anticlimax, are fine material for anyone who wants to learn transposing. For example:

VANCOUVER, Wash., March 24, 1948—Death instead of help came to all but two survivors of an Army plane crash in the snowcapped mountains north of here despite their frantic attempts to signal search planes.
