

JAZZ

Jazz originated at the end of the 19th century in New Orleans. It developed from black work songs and spirituals and was predominantly African. It was different from earlier styles of music because it used improvisation. In Western musical traditions, the composer wrote a piece of music on paper and the musicians interpreted what the composer had written. Jazz was different: in a jazz piece, the musicians, who often could not read music, started with a song and as they went along, they improvised making every performance personal and unique. By the time they had finished, the musicians had composed a new piece that was often very different from the original song.

The first jazz was played by African-American and Creole musicians in New Orleans, who were often very poor. At the beginning, bands often marched through town playing a style of jazz called New Orleans jazz or Dixieland jazz. This style included heavy, sad music for funerals and exuberant songs for Mardi Gras. It was played by small bands usually made up of cornet or trumpet, clarinet, trombone, and a rhythm section that included bass, drums, guitar. Sometimes there was also a piano but when they were marching, a bass or a tuba were used instead of a piano.

Many people didn't understand the spontaneity of jazz and at first it was not greatly accepted in America. This was mainly because it was played by poor, black people at a time when there was segregation, racism and cultural misunderstanding.

Jazz became more popular when white orchestras adapted or imitated it. However jazz clubs soon became segregated with separate clubs for African-American and white audiences. The music that was played in "Negro clubs" was faster than the jazz played in white dance halls, but even the jazz in the "Negro clubs" was slow in comparison to the jazz of New Orleans.

It became an accepted form of entertainment in the late 1930s when Benny Goodman led racially mixed groups in concerts at Carnegie Hall, a famous theatre in Manhattan.
