ABSTRACT

As newer methods of management are made available, and accessible, survival rates with human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) are increasing. This means that chronic, metabolic complications of HIV are becoming more frequent in clinical practice, as acute morbidity is controlled. Management of HIV/acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (AIDS) is gradually expanding to include these chronic and metabolic complications of the disease, and the adverse effects associated with its treatments, including diabetes. Unfortunately, no guidelines are available to help the medical practitioners choose appropriate therapy for patients with these conditions. The aim of the South Asian Consensus Guidelines is to provide evidence-based recommendations to assist healthcare providers in the rational management of type 2 diabetes mellitus in patients with HIV. The development of these guidelines used systematic reviews of available evidence to form its key recommendations. These guidelines and associated review of literature represent a compilation of available knowledge regarding rational management of diabetes in HIV. Patients of diabetes with concomitant HIV infection are managed optimally with insulin therapy and judicious use of highly active antiretroviral therapy with suitable alternatives is also recommended. These guidelines should prove helpful to physicians, not only in South Asia, but also across the globe, while managing patients with coexistent HIV and diabetes.

Key words: Diabetes, human immunodeficiency virus, South Asian Guidelines and acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (AIDS) are increasing in number, partly due to improved methods of screening, diagnosis and treatment. Figures reveal that the total number of patients with HIV is 33 million, with 2.7 million new infections in 2007.<sup>1,2</sup> Most of these patients are in sub-Saharan Africa and Asia.

As newer methods of management are made available, and accessible, survival rates with HIV are increasing. This means that chronic metabolic complications of HIV are becoming more frequent in clinical practice, as acute morbidity is controlled.
