Monetary Transmission in the Euro Area Ignazio Angeloni, 2003 Drawing on recent Eurosystem research that uses a range of econometric techniques and a number of new data sets we propose a comprehensive description of how monetary policy affects the euro area economy We focus mainly on three questions 1 what are the stylized facts concerning the transmission of monetary policy for the area as a whole and for individual countries 2 can the classic interest rate channel IRC alone without capital market imperfections explain these facts 3 if not is the bank lending channel a likely candidate to complete the story We find plausible euro area wide monetary policy responses for prices and output that are similar to those generally reported for the U S However investment relative to consumption seems to play a larger role in euro area monetary policy transmission than in the U S We cannot reject the hypothesis that the IRC completely characterizes transmission in a few countries and estimate it to be substantial in almost all Where the IRC is not dominant there is normally some direct evidence supporting the presence of a bank lending channel or other financial transmission channel The cases where financial effects appear important can be further split according to whether they primarily relate to consumption or investment

The Risk-Taking Channel of Monetary Policy Transmission in the Euro-Area Matthias Neuenkirch,2018 In this paper we provide evidence for a risk taking channel of monetary policy transmission in the euro area that works through the relaxation of lending standards for borrowers Our dataset covers the period 2003Q1 2016Q2 and includes in addition to the standard variables for real GDP growth inflation and the monetary policy stance indicators of bank lending standards and bank lending margins Based on vector autoregressive models with i recursive identification and ii sign restrictions we show that banks react aggressively to an expansionary monetary policy shock by lowering their lending standards The banks efforts to keep their lending margin stable however are not successful as we detect a significant compression We document these findings for the euro area as a whole and for its individual member states In particular banks in the Netherlands Portugal Spain and Ireland lowered their lending standards after expansionary monetary policy shocks The compression of the lending margin is most pronounced in the five crisis countries Greece Ireland Italy Portugal and Spain
