
Sexual Politics and Socialist Housing: Building Homes in Revolutionary Cuba

Carrie Hamilton

Feminists have long been concerned with the question of home. Historians of gender and the family have investigated gendered divisions of labour in the household and 'public' sphere,¹ while theorists of migration and globalisation have turned their attention to discourses of home among those displaced by conflict, genocide and/or the search for economic security.² Feminist geographers have studied the gendered construction of urban and rural spaces, including the domestic.³ More recently, concerns with women and gender have expanded to include sexuality, as historians, geographers and queer theorists analyse the construction of sexual terrains.⁴

But notwithstanding the expansive feminist and queer literature on homes and space, this work as a whole pays relatively little attention to housing issues.⁵ While contemporary studies of gender, sexuality, home and space sometimes address inequalities in access to housing, most have little to say about the sexual politics of housing policy and provision, their relationship to gendered and sexualised discourses and power regimes, and the vastly different material contexts in which homes are built – literally and figuratively – across time and space.⁶ Generally, moreover, this literature displays a bias towards Western, capitalist societies and a lack of attention to developing, socialist or transitional economies.

This article addresses some of these imbalances by examining the interconnectedness of home and housing in revolutionary Cuba. It begins by reviewing the secondary literature on Cuban housing and the family, respectively, before analysing a series of interviews from the 'Memories of the Cuban Revolution' oral history project.⁷ The related problems of finding a house and being 'at home' run through most of the interviews. While popular and official rhetoric in Cuba, as in most nation-states, often celebrates the family as the centre of national identity, the interviews complicate this narrative, highlighting sites of family conflict as well as support. Family disputes and disunity are exacerbated by gender inequalities, homophobia, racism and an ongoing, acute housing shortage. Historians of race in Cuba have made the link between weaknesses in revolutionary housing policy and persistent racial inequalities.⁸ This article supplements that work, arguing that the history of housing and homes since 1959 is tied as well to the regime's gender and sexual politics. However, historians and other scholars of the Cuban Revolution usually treat housing and home as separate issues. The aim of this article is to begin to historicise the relationship between the politics
