Abstract. With the promotion and application of big data, mathematical models are also more widely referenced in the research and development of different professions. In this paper, the relationship between mathematical modeling and social sciences will be explored by examining the application of mathematical modeling in social sciences through quantitative analysis. In addition, the author is willing to learn about different models related to economics, psychology, and sociology. Based on the analysis, this paper provides relevant suggestions for solving potential problems in the application of models, including, that attention should be paid to the description of contextual details, that the results of the study should take into account motivational factors, and that the data involved must be valid and not too superficial.

Keywords: social science, mathematical model, economics, psychology, sociology, applications.

1. Introduction

Due to the long-term influence of inductive, deductive, and inferential research paradigms, the recognition of data value in the field of humanities and social sciences is relatively late. Against the backdrop of big data, open data, and intelligent technological innovation, theoretical and empirical research in the field of humanities and social sciences are gradually being influenced by the tide of data. Data driven approaches have become a new paradigm pursued by humanities and social sciences, and data resources have been described as an emerging source of knowledge discovery and academic innovation. In this context, the humanities and social sciences field has opened up many explorations of old scenarios, new problems, and new scenarios and problems. Model involves starting from practical problems, conducting in-depth investigation and research, understanding object information, making simplified assumptions, analyzing internal laws, and using mathematical symbols and language to express and establish mathematical models.

Social science refers to the science that focuses on social phenomena as its research object. Its task is to study and elucidate various social phenomena and their development laws. The application of mathematical modeling in social sciences mainly involves establishing mathematical models to analyze social problems in detail and provide decision-making support for policies. Social science encompasses disciplines such as economics, political science, history, sociology, psychology, etc [1-3].

This paper analyzes the application of mathematical modeling and quantitative perspectives to economics, psychology and sociology. The paper begins by discussing specific references to mathematical models in economics, sociology and psychology, and explains and describes models relevant to the social sciences, including the "APC" model, the Marshall Trade Tables, and others. Based on the above analysis, the article will suggest solutions to the problems of the relevant models.
