

Basic Air Conditioning Piping Recommendations – Liquid Lines

With all of that said — now let's look at liquid lines! Liquid lines must be sized, like suction lines, to minimize pressure change. With liquid lines, there are two factors that come into play that actually creates the sum of the pressure change. Like suction lines, you have the loss due to friction (tubing size, number of fittings, length, etc) but you also have pressure loss / gain due to the static head in a vertical line. Liquid pressure loss reduces the amount of liquid sub-cooling at a rate of 1 degree for every 5 psi for R-410A. Sufficient sub-cooling must be maintained at the metering device (particularly the TXV) to allow proper operation. If the liquid pressure drop is high enough to not maintain a column of liquid in the line at all times, liquid will begin to "flash" reducing the refrigerant flow to and through the indoor coil metering device (TXV). Then, the whole effect begins to snow ball and as soon as flash gas starts in the liquid line, the rate of pressure loss increases and continues to increase as the amount of gas increases and so on and so on and so on! As we get more "gas" in the coil, superheat goes up (and remember what Bruce said) and too much superheat kills compressors.

Properly sized liquid lines will minimize the pressure drop and system charge. Liquid line should be sized as small as possible without exceeding the recommended pressure drop. The other thing to consider is refrigerant velocity inside the line. The MAXIMUM recommended liquid line velocity is 400 fpm. Velocities higher than this can and will result in higher than acceptable noise levels.

But now we also need to look elevation differences since this will affect a pressure loss/gain on the line. Let's start with the indoor unit ABOVE the outdoor unit. With this configuration, a common problem with the cooling is that the amount of liquid sub-cooling varies as operating conditions change. Under some conditions it is possible that flashing will occur in the liquid riser. The liquid static LOSS can be calculated at 1/2 psi per foot of rise. When the indoor unit is above the outdoor unit, the pressure loss in the liquid line during the cooling cycle will limit the amount of elevation difference allowed. Maximum loss is 30 psi. So the static loss due to "head pressure" plus the friction loss — line length, fitting, etc — limit the elevation difference in this configuration.
